ongoing efforts to protect its intellectual property, customers, and authorized sales network.

Following the previously announced trademark victory, these cases addressed the unauthorized use of RCF branding on loudspeakers, enclosures, packaging, and online product listings, as well as infringement of a loudspeaker design patent.

The judgments and settlement require the parties involved to cease the infringing activities. They reinforce RCF's ability to act against the misuse of its name and the unauthorized reproduction of its protected designs.

A product bearing the RCF name without authorization offers no assurance that it meets RCF's engineering, safety, testing, or manufacturing standards, carries the applicable certifications, or qualifies for official support. Genuine RCF products are developed through an integrated process that combines acoustic research, transducer design, electronics, and mechanical engineering, supported by rigorous quality control.

"Customers and partners must be able to trust the RCF name," said Federico Lugli, RCF Head of Distributor Sales. "These outcomes support our ongoing efforts to protect that trust and the work behind our products. We will continue to take action against the unauthorized use of our trademarks and protected designs."

RCF recommends purchasing through authorized dealers and contacting the company before buying if a seller's authorization is unclear. The dedicated Buy Authentic page provides guidance on verifying product authenticity and finding authorized sales channels. RCF will continue to monitor the global market and work with the relevant authorities to address infringement and protect customers and authorized partners.
